THE NATION'S WOMEN

The women of the United States like men are responding and giving their all to the cause of their country.

They are going into the industries to take the places of men who have gone to do a greater service for their country; they are urging their sons, brothers, and husbands to action. They are expending every energy and are justifying the trust which has been placed in them.

At this time comes a greater agitation for equal suffrage for women. The women of the nation have found themselves, have proven their strength and their dependability, and now they ask for equal rights in governmental functions.

The denying of suffrage to women is denying all of the premises of democracy. They have been granted all other rights except that of the right of the exercise of the franchise.

It would be well for the United States as an expression of appreciation toward the women of the nation to make at this time a provision extending to them the right of the ballot and of a share in the government which they are so loyally supporting.

ITALY WAKES UP

Little Italy, the boot of Europe, has buckled on the spur all the tighter. Rather inactive in the war lately as far as an extensive offensive campaign was concerned, this historic enemy of Austria is now giving the best it has to bring success to the Allied armies. Her drive on Trieste is relieving other fronts, in that Austrian forces are being shifted in an effort to stay the viciousness of the Italian attack.

The Italian for centuries has been regarded as an efficient fighting man. Napoleon, often alluded to as the "fighting Corsican" was in reality an Italian. Italy has produced other men of the same caliber as Napoleon. The fighting blood of long campaigns has been instilled into the blood of the armistice. What is inbred is bound to find emittance.

Italy's moment has arrived. She realizes it. Her assistance is needed. She is striking hard. The situation on the eastern and western fronts depends to some extent on Italy's efforts for relief. She realizes it, and accordingly is giving the best she has.

The American press arises to its loftiest of possibilities at the time of a national crisis. These days, though hardly to be reckoned a crisis, are certainly acute. By divesting themselves of passion, the American press, unhampered by censorship, always presenting the facts as they are, can exert a powerful influence in preventing democracy to be defiled.

The opposition to the increase of the second class postage rate in the House has brought out an expression of sentiment regarding the newspapers of the United States. They are considered "of educational value." Yet many seek to muzzle that power which others see as a resource of the nation.

Women are to take men's jobs now that war is here, but it is doubtful if they have the vocabulary that men think a bawdy team of Missouri mules or a bawdy automobile engine needs.

The quintessence of "show me" is a Missouri newspaperman.
